

Restriction is ineffective as a preventative measure.

Restriction is ineffective as a preventative measure.

In society, in politics, in communication, in law - everywhere.

Humanity, in time, will learn this - either the hard way or the not-so-hard way.

Do a thought experiment with me:

Find the most vulgar, disgusting thought you have. Really put it in there, imagine it clearly.

And try to restrict yourself from thinking it now.

And every time you're on the brink of seeing it again - shut it out.

You think you got rid of the thought by having restricted it?

Or has it simply been buried in the subconscious?

How will that thought now manifest elsewhere - on the body, on the mind, on the mood and temperament?

Now scale that effect up to humanity as a whole.

You suppress a thing, you restrict it - it will appear elsewhere symptomatically.

Comments

Q @Q_WAV_ · 2026-03-30

Is the alternative measure to think of something beautiful?

Miko @scray1928 · 2026-03-30

Jack I see myself failing with lust endlessly and I understand what you mean.

What else I do then?

halsonissen @halsonissen · 2026-03-30

I like what you avoid you create interchangeable with ur restrict maybe

SIR Dating | Christoph @Jinn_Imagio · 2026-03-30

Trick to take the charge out of the thought:

Recreate it in many variations. Make it smaller, bigger. Put a different background to it, put it into a different time..