

comment

The primary goal for an ivory tower becomes an foremost imperative to be achieved by any means necessary, before dedicating your life for non-monetary exploration, that intuitive-thinkers always incumbently stumble onto, discovering varied gold-dusts, that drives innovation, and paradigm shifts.

Wealth in all of its forms indeed is the weapon for defending against the brain-rot of the evolutionary degenerative human, not meant to be a part of an pluralist society,

From my personal experiences,

Latent Dark-triad traits remain subconsciously in the peasants and the shepherds psyche, in growing spectrums, the peasant lacking his energy to actualize them and hence their adulation to their supposed charlatans, who happened to be the highest self expression of the vain ambitions of the peasants.

As you described, they become energy Vampires who we shall not acknowledge their pitiful existence, who we shall not give them our energy.

‘Unproven inferiors with no prowess trying to issue commands without authority and quibble semantics without insights trying to bother you with their petty rebellion.’

---

wanted to hear opinions on challenging oligarchic business ecosystems of the third worlds, particularly India, If we are on the topic of gaining wealth and power.

What's stopping INTP's from wanting to be part of the slow growth trajectories, and serve the west in whatever export bases,

I am sure there are too many inefficiencies to capitalize on which our brains are equipped to handle?

Perhaps everything's way too 'saturated'?

I see so many chest thumping digital propaganda from our ape-looking bureaucrats in my home-city Bengaluru, driving to be silicon valley of south Asia.

---

further musings:

- Slow Collapse of Indian subcontinent and the third world. Dravidian Breakaway?

- Post capitalist productive economies.
- The power tussle of the cancer-cell ideology of the west or the neck deep authority obeying cultures of the east.

And who should the powers of AGI and its further development, fall into the hands of, if not for somebody who is introverted thinking intuitive.

“Remember, the apex predator always hunts alone, not because it must, but because isolation has thought it, that dependence is the first step towards becoming prey”

- further musings: Slow Collapse of Indian subcontinent and the third world. Dravidian Breakaway? Post capitalist productive economies. The power tussle of the cancer-cell ideology of the west or the neck deep authority obeying cultures of the east. And who should the powers of AGI and its further development, fall into the hands of, If not for somebody who is introverted thinking intuitive.

Profound questions. Would've been nicer to post/repost these so it stands out. Your comment was collapsed when I logged into my Quora this morning.

1. The Dravidian breakaway is entirely plausible, the precedent for it already seems to have arrived with the pastoral Aryan population's insensitivity towards regional languages. There will always be a faction that, in their admiration for the dairy-fed degenerate, become their soldiers on the ground. We see this in every notable country, where a certain, highly problematic sect of the population (peasants with Dark Triad as you mention) who carry out the West's dirty work on the ground. The Trump administration's defunding of USAID has put hundreds if not thousands of these pawns and middlemen out of business, ranging from top journalists to humanitarian and advocacy groups that pursue an agenda. While on the one side I think the peasants will slowly rot while increasingly clinging onto the white man's boot for salvation, another side will build independently. As rigid as Eastern cultures may seem, you have to admire how the CCP handled an euthyroid Liang Wenfeng, elevating him to the highest ranks. If this were India, the same individual would have been squashed and his ideas siphoned into the laps of a Gujarati businessman running an "IT" shell company, with the government conspiring to maintain their poster-boy's image. A civilization's survival is contingent upon how well it elevates its euthyroid, i.e. those capable of clear thinking and purposeful action, even if the highest ranks are not necessarily bestowed with that capacity.
2. The self-hating, insecure peasants of the East will probably flock en-masse to the West. This is already well underway. This West will need these spineless weasels to do their bidding to maintain their hegemon. I think this will clean up our gene pool in the East/South, leaving a relatively less Dark consciousness behind. Some of the most questionable humans I've encountered all shared a strong affinity for the West. Indian innovation itself, as I see, is built in the image of impressing the white man. India is an insecure nation pretending to be strong. If you simply let some of these "ape-looking" types speak long enough, they'll reveal all of their motivations. You'll see how they're sole metric of pride is how well they are either accepted or stand amongst Europeans. When an Indian filmmaker is more set on winning the Oscars than putting out a good production, that's how you know where the Indian psyche stands. My experience with Indians in the US has only further exposed me to this self-hating, power-hungry mentality of the hypothyroid. In every mythology, there exists a purgative force or figure who is said to be charismatic, loved-by-all. He comes into the Earth, not to lead the peasants to salvation, but to their ruin, to take them down along with his destructive tendencies. His task? To purge the weak-willed, the hypocrites, and the dormant evil that may have gotten comfortable in this world.
3. As with most things, AGI is only as good as its ability to be used/maintained/developed for what it's worth, a task the peasants and the pastoralists are collectively terrible at. Case in point, Europe's loot at the turn of the 18th Century. Europe was poised to remain at the top of the world for eternity, only that it did not (and can not). Momentary advantages should not be mistaken for compounding prosperity. I can give away my business formula to my degenerate competitor, which he will short-sightedly exploit for temporary gains. However, only I will know how it can be worked upon, how to troubleshoot, and most importantly, how it works at a base level. Natural selection is primed through adaptation pressures. The civilization that built itself upon another man's genius (without rightfully elevating him) will find itself lost without his genius. The rise and fall of companies that build themselves upon the exploited labours of the euthyroid is proof of this reality. I've further seen proof of this in the open-source software community. A certain brilliant project gets sabotaged and plastered with a proprietary name. However, the genius doesn't die out, and the community eventually builds a better, smarter version of the software they once built from the ground-up, like how Linux kernel is being re-built with memory-safe Rust. As for the corporations, they're left helpless, stuck with their collegiate peasant devs who were only versed in the art of hoop-jumping (i.e. navigating arbitrary power structures) and LinkedIn posturing unable to churn out even a fraction of the genius, let alone figure how to work upon the stolen project.

From <<https://energy2intuit.quora.com/>>

Your personal mythos on white mens task from the degenerate WEST on this space vessel called Earth, truly is yet another gold dust.

And let the comments be collapsible through serendipity,

Kind of like the info-arbitrage, AT SUCH SCALES I reckon.

Yeah, open-source for the win too...I personally use obsidian, lot of LLM chinese models, and pirated books too.

I find Arc from The Browser Company excellent for large scale research too.

PS: Honorary mention of the Netflix sci-fi WebSeries:

Travelers \(TV Series 2016–2018\) ★ 8.0 | Drama, Mystery, Sci-Fi

For shaping a lot of my implications for AGI.

1

Reply

Kakalukium

· 50m

PROJECT IVORY TOWER?

1

Reply

Chihiro

· 20m

And let the comments be collapsible through serendipity,...

I love this attitude. Quora's algorithm has given itself away over the years. There appears to be an internal 'ranking' or 'merit' system. Once your content has been downvoted or reported a certain number of times, it doesn't even show them, perhaps to keep the site digestible for the average mind of a limbic bent.

Obsidian is great! While Obsidian was originally a Chinese college student's creation, there appears to be similar PKMs that are all over the place like SiYuan. I use Obsidian synced with Remotely Save to my personal, self-hosted WebDAV server. Total privacy over my cloud. Remotely Save works seamlessly across devices.

Arc is sleek! But I run Debian with KDE Plasma and GNOME desktop here so, I'll have to wait to get my Windows PC to try it out. I've gone too deep into the Linux ecosystem to leave it now, considering how seamlessly it integrates with all of my needs (hobby development, gaming with an emulator, bash terminal, etc), notwithstanding the plethora of chic desktop environments like Hyprland!

Hyprland: Dynamic tiling window compositor with the looks

You could help me by suggesting books that you mention. I've had no luck finding good bedtime reads on mainstream internet.

1

Reply

Chihiro

· 12m

Speaking of open-source, have you heard of ActivityPub, the protocol Fediverse networking apps/clients run on? You can host your own ActivityPub instance and in-essence create your own private social network with zero censorship and no intrusion from peasants.

I've been thinking of other ways to build a community here on the internet. I know reddit is too far gone.

1

Reply

Kakalukium

· Just now

Thx a lot for your technical nuggets. More brain food indeed.

Reply

Nobita Nobi

· 46m

Which possibility do you extrapolate more?

1. The powers of AGI reaches a saturation after having replaced the mid level software engineers, leaving a purpose only to intuitive problem solvers in the technical roles.
2. AGI develops to being able to work in a way I would call pseudo-intuitive, that is apparently reciprocating the human type intuitions and motivations in problem-solving and creating, leaving humans with the purpose of only solving noble theoretical problems, or just being a connoisseur. In this case what do you think the economic distribution over the world population shall look like?

A week earlier I asked Deepseek, Chat GPT and Qwen to solve a somewhat easy logical puzzle. Both GPT and Qwen produced incorrect forced solutions after certain logical steps as it required an intuitive approach of creating possibilities at a point. But Deepseek not only did it generate the correct solution but also worked almost three times that done by the other two. At point when it's approach was getting quite tangled it remarked- "Wait, this is getting a bit tangled. Let's try to approach it differently." That's a tad bit human type motivation and intuition.

2

Reply

Nobita Nobi

· Fri

Until that ivory tower is accessible or a community of similar sane minded intuitive individuals is created , these spaces can aid to maintaining sanity in this often exasperating immediate reality. Thanks a lot... :{)

1

Reply

Kakalukium

· Fri

Aligning yourself on an deep seated concious level towards a path to highest metabolism, and truth seeking shall allow you to intuit tangible emotional states and thoughts,
And make the universe conspire anything in your favour, through incredible odds, granted you are deserving of it

2

Reply

From <https://energy2intuit.quora.com/>

I like how you narrowed it down to two possible trajectories for AGI.

This isn't my opinion but purely observations, so feel free to nudge anything that seems outdated. I think there's two categories of AI that's being developed, the LLMs, which are really just machine learning with a temperature variable for creative outputs, and AGI, which are fully autonomous, i.e. they can direct themselves to seek experiences, much like humans, to restructure their core architecture. An LLM cannot do that. It is architecturally constrained by its makers. An AGI must seek experience to evolve to be considered general intelligence.

Alibaba's Qwen appear to be fully pushing for LLMs in enterprise, replacing workforce and automating away workflows that is. I don't think Alibaba or Claude are invested in building AGI. Of all the contenders, I feel DeepSeek might be the first to pull it off.

I say this because they are not approaching AI from a technical standpoint. Their founder has remarked how he prefers employees with a humanities background. He wants people who can think, and by being good at it, can help their company's creations emulate it. They don't seem to be pursuing LLM as a neat-and-tidy 'workforce replacement' the way Claude have fully positioned themselves.

> We're going to do AGI.

> It's driven by curiosity.

LIANG WENFENG

> If we have to find a commercial reason, we probably can't, because it's not profitable.

> It's like someone buying a piano for a home—first, they can afford it, and second, such a group of people are eager to play beautiful music on it.

> The most attractive thing for top-tier talent is the opportunity to solve the world's toughest challenges.

> The top 50 people may not be in China, but maybe we can build them ourselves.

> OpenAI isn't divine; they can't lead forever.

> We won't go closed-source. We believe that establishing a robust technology ecosystem matters more.

> Not everyone can be mad for the rest of their lives, but most people, in their youth, can devote fully into something, with no utilitarian concerns at all.

> Building an organization and culture that can consistently innovate is our real moat.

> Giants have users, but their cash cows shackle them

> Giving back is an honor, and it attracts talent.

> I focus on whether something elevates societal efficiency

> As long as the ultimate goal boosts efficiency, it's valid.

> The real gap is between originality and imitation.

> If this doesn't change, China will always be a follower.

> the whole society still needs to be educated by the facts.

> All we still need are some facts and a process.

> Someone must step onto the frontier.

About your comparison of LLMs, I couldn't agree more. In my coding prompts, DeepSeek has consistently not only understood my requests but also connected the dots on its own to suggest more optimisations on a case-by-case basis. Even with simple coding prompts, ChatGPT and Qwen fail to grasp the context sufficiently, and they require several iterations of prompting before they mess up altogether.

OG post

Okay.. I would like to vent out something. I am actually living through what bro Chihiro broached here.

Profile photo for Chihiro

Chihiro · 6mo

What advice would an older INTP give a younger INTP?

Gain power (wealth) and maintain exclusivity. Do not let the peasants feel comfortable with you, or be led to think you are 'one of them.' The peasants lack higher intelligence, which means they do not exhibit many of the signs of abstract intelligence seen in the INTP, such as a high level of intrinsic motivation, convictions of their own, a moral conscience, principles they honour, self-initiative, self-direction, and such. They lack self-awareness, living their whole lives in ignorance (and denial) of their own nature and by-extension those of others.

The average Joe in our grain-fed societies is irritable, bored, and mentally disorganised. When faced with stress, such as a pending mortgage/EMI payment, he rouses himself to take action through his conditioned responses. At all other times, he seeks to mindless distractions in spectator sports or Netflix, or goes about seeking drama to amuse himself. He cannot organise his life under his own watch, lacking self-direction, and it is this predicament that has led him to favour a society that weeds out challenge in all its forms in favour of triviality and formality, namesake pleasantries and rituals, that gives his inebriated mind a fighting chance to make sense of reality.

The peasants are only able to relate to others as 'above' or 'below' them, as 'superior' or 'inferior', and this judgement alone guides their attitudes towards you. If you, as an egalitarian-minded INTP, make the mistake of going about life in your humble elements, you will attract all kinds of mistreatment because the peasant, who operates from the same level of intelligence as a dog, sees no consequence. To live amongst his society where he has the numbers, you must maintain not only the impression of being 'superior' in his eyes but also class — a form of socio-economic exclusivity. It's only when you establish yourself as 'above' him does the peasant stay on his good behaviour. If you make the mistake of working alongside the peasants on equal terms, you will draw upon yourself animosity for your gifts and contempt for your indifferences, for he lacks the humanitarian qualities of tolerance, empathy, and understanding. His consciousness is primarily limbic, shaped by fear, self-interest that is.

Think about it. Nobody is jealous of Warren Buffett. Why? Because they see themselves in an entirely different league from him. However, if the same billionaire investor spent time around a group of peons, drinking their pissy beers and watching their brain-rot football games and indulging in their lowly preoccupations (speculating on the weight of the bar girl, for example), the peons will quickly develop animosity for him, feeling entitled to his successes because, in their mind's eye, they are one of his kind. The peasants, unlike you, an INTP, lack self-concepts and self-referential thinking. They measure their whole selves against others, by pitting themselves against one another, and it is through this hypocrisy (of comparing themselves against the very people they associate on superficial terms with) do they validate themselves and build their sense of self.

The peasants, in all, lack independent intelligences, talents, and skills of their own other than those passed down the generations or cultivated into him through formal training/education. Because of their comparative mindset that lacks footing in itself, they have given way to an exclusionary culture of intolerance and bigotry as a way to remove any painful reminders of their inadequacy as humans. Since this bigotry can take violent forms in this limbic human that knows no higher inhibitions (principles, for example), as the peasants have demonstrated for the longest time in history (through witch hunts, burning people at the stake, lynching others over differences in belief, etc), the more sane among us must maintain, at least outwardly (on the same level the peasants perceive the world at), the impression of being 'above' them.

To the peasant, moral education takes the form of dogma (religiosity and rituals) and ambition the form of opportunism (status, perks, reputation, etc). It shouldn't surprise then why the most arduous adherents of religion are also terribly empty on the inside, often harbouring these vain ambitions, being over-represented among those who commit crimes against humanity. INTPs make the mistake of thinking too fairly and straight-forwardly about a world that is anything but morally clean, often neglecting their finances in-favour of their hobbies and self-pursuits, be that some niche obsession in a skilled art or what not, that they forget about the realities of life under a morally perverted and sickly agricultural society, hoping that the same society will compensate them fairly on some fine occasion for their self-sacrifice.

While you tirelessly work on your craft, they are out there comparing who has the bigger car or better house or who's paper has been cited more times (as if that marks scientific achievement), having organised their social relationships and society in catering to these vain concerns. A younger INTP would save themselves a lot of disappointment and trouble if they realise early that independent wealth creation is the only route to preserving their identity and individuality in a world that is fundamentally hostile to the free-thinking and amicable Bohemian who wishes to 'live and let live', as this will be your only shot at redeeming yourself and fighting for your causes, i.e. when you break free from their hegemonic oppression.

Build a community, if not, keep a paid entourage. Hire chauffeurs, domestic helpers, chefs, and personal assistants to make calls or run errands for you. You can never be one among the tribe as the tribe, in our agrarian societies consisting of peasants, is morally corrupt. Unless you bring yourself down to their level of sickness and low-mindedness, unless you engage in their silly gossips, masturbatory peacocking, namesake rituals, and share the same levels of vanity and shallowness in thought and ambition, they will reject you at first sight owing to fear. A sick animal is driven primarily by fear as its orienting reflex to novelty, resulting in unfound hatred, while that of a healthy, flourishing animal is one of exploration and acceptance.

Your mere openness, your healthy ways, the brilliance in your eyes and the soul you put into your work, serves to scratch at the root of their insecurities, reminding them gently of all they are not while simultaneously leaving them feeling exposed for their malarkey. The peasants cannot bring themselves to collaborating on mutually respectful terms, respecting personal boundaries and indifferences, since that would require them to operate from a level of fairness that wouldn't sustain their ways of life. As an INTP, you will realise the high school locker room is a fitting metaphor for larger society, be that the boardroom at Microsoft or the peer-review panel of an "esteemed" scientific journal, say, the Journal of The American Medical Association, where the prototypical behaviours and attitudes you witnessed among your high school's football team — the bullying, gossiping, ostracizing those who don't listen to the same music or own the same phone or sneaker brand as others, preoccupation over trivial and frivolous matters, and narrow scope of ambition — is more systemic to larger society.

These rituals, be that sorority hazing or fraternity induction ceremonies, serve to humiliate one into loathing their individuality, so the new recruit seeks to tribe validation and loses all autonomy. Such a character can be easily manipulated by handing out crumbs of validation or setting up incentive schemes into performing actions without moral consideration or critical thinking. This rite of passage safeguards their internal secrets and any immorality they wish to conceal from the world as the potential whistleblower has already been thoroughly demoralised and subjugated. Ask yourself, why would a righteous and self-assured society find it necessary to degrade those unlike them before bringing themselves to collaborating with them? It is an insecure and immoral cult that would require such rites of passage, as are our societies.

As you grow older and wiser, you will lose any reverence you once held for these social institutions and the ranks they bestow upon its conforming members, seeing them as nothing more than cesspits of the cowardly that have congregated to protect their interests and maintain the outwardly impression of doing dignified work. Since agricultural society is mentally ill and you're not, you cannot collaborate with them. Any attempts to do so, however amicably, will always be undermined and sabotaged from the other side since they fear the man who cannot be controlled, isn't lame, and is righteous (not the masturbatory sense of righteousness that religion promotes where the peasants convince each other of their 'goodness' for believing in the same sky daddy). Your mere gifts will irritate the timid mind. In their mind's eye, you cannot be better than them. It threatens their comparative sense of self.

Moreover, you cannot be better than them without needing them, since that gives them no role to perform and benefit from in their specialised, imitation-based economy, let alone bring moral justification to their ways of life. Individuation and secular achievement cannot be had in the peasant's social fabric. They do not want a society where individuals flourish in their own lanes and come together to collaborate respecting each other, without imposing their beliefs or demanding that they give up on their individuality in order to win acceptance. For the INTP or just about any mentally sane human in our sickly grain-eating societies, this leaves a personal entourage the only means of building a protective safety net around you, where needs that you could've met through the tribe had they not been so pathetic have to be obtained at a price since the rule out there is intolerance.

Your personal entourage will serve to buffer in large part the unproductive toxicity you'll be pulling into your life should you engage with society by yourself without a middle man who's more adept at speaking the language of the peasant to represent you, and who's demeanor would be less likely to scratch some limbic itch in the repressed mind of the peasant. Until you can build yourself a community, your entourage will allow you to help yourself in society without needing to sell yourself out to an already clueless peasantry.

Though I often doubt being an INTP and feel like an imposter in this space. Till two years ago, I wasn't an "ambitious" kid. I lived by the "live and let live" ideology, caring only about my passions and hobbies. I dropped out of my engineering college to practice music full-time, partly because academia felt like a drag—filled with utterly meaningless rote work incentivized by grades, jobs, and "stability"—and partly because of my passion for making music. I was certain that if I continued, I would eventually be able to afford a decent roof over my head and healthy food for myself. What's wrong with living simply and dying simple?

But things gradually changed. I began to realize that without some degree of power (wealth), I couldn't maintain exclusivity, even though I didn't (and still don't) have many materialistic desires or a fetish for exhibiting power. To even rent a private room in a student paying guest accommodation, I had to pay twice what others paid. Even then, my personal space was constantly violated by unnecessary noise—other inmates playing loud, obnoxious music or engaging in mindless, loud chit-chats, while I wanted to enjoy Satie or Chopin, analyze avant-garde compositions, or experiment with my own music. Or there were the neighborhood loudspeakers (it's India, so you know the collectivist culture). Complaining, whether gently or rudely, didn't help because these "peasants" (a metaphor for the average Joe in our agricultural society) don't understand personal boundaries, lack self-awareness, and don't know how to introspect or find common ground (like turning off the speaker and switching to headphones). They only react with their egos immensely hurt when you ask them to compromise on something that gives them instant gratification or pleasure. They're slaves to their habits.

Not only that, but these beings are highly hierarchical. To them, ambition manifests as higher titles or ranks, and morality is tied to social norms and dogmas. They won't treat you well unless you hold a higher position in their eyes. Unlike me, who is egalitarian-minded, they see you as either higher or lower, never equal. They often have a fetish for controlling others or imposing their advice, despite their low competence and clueless way of life. It was common for someone obnoxious to pressure or rebuke me to conform to the status quo—like socializing with them or returning to my degree course. Don't mistake this for concern; it was just their fetish for authority. It's quite similar to college seniors who love to bully (in India, famously known as "ragging") under the guise of altruism or "bonding."

Moreover, these "peasants" are self-destructive. Their very existence is destructive to themselves and the environment. For instance, their consumption-centered lifestyles contribute to environmental degradation. If I don't become wealthy enough, how will I escape the mess created by these masses? I need to ensure I can afford a cocoon—a space isolated from noise, with access to healthy air, water, and food. This is a significant concern, especially in a nation like India.

Then there's the family trouble. I don't come from a peaceful family. Since childhood, I've been overwhelmed by frequent, intense fights between my parents, as well as between my parents and their siblings. Finally leaving home for college was a relief. It was extremely foolish of me not to prioritize financial independence sooner and to minimize my connections with them. Instead, I extended my dependence on them by half a decade. On top of that, they're unsophisticated and don't understand my passions or plans.

Even though I enrolled in Engineering, I used to self-study undergraduate Physics and Math. Fundamental sciences were clearly more my cup of tea. Choosing Electrical Engineering was another stupid decision I made as an 18-year-old, simply because I loved solving circuits and was intrigued by moving systems, even though I knew I'd be exposed to heuristic applications of science. Later, while practicing music full-time, I felt a void—something that could fully feed my intuitive and logical desires was missing.

Given all this, I decided to return to formal education. Going back to the Engineering degree was obviously a big NO. The heuristic learning, stupid assignments, and maintaining lab files were my greatest pet peeves. It made more sense to obtain my undergraduate degree through distance learning which is mostly about self-learning (which I am more comfortable with) and pursue a postgraduate degree from a premium institute in this country, whether to continue in academia, enter the industry, or the best to pursue self-employment.

Hobbies will always be there, waiting in the personal sphere. But total financial independence—not even relying on grants or monthly salaries—should be the highest priority for any intrinsically motivated, sane human (possibly with a higher IQ) living in this insane, sickly, extrinsically motivated, and clueless society.

If in doubt, engage with the peasants as you'd discipline an unruly child or a dog. Gone are my days of "appealing to reason". At the end of the day, the peasants will feel victimised by you/hate you — whether you bend yourself to their collectivistic wishes for you (in which case you shall be exploited rather than accommodated as an equal with due respect and space) OR oppress them by being a whimsical figure (in which case you shall be hated, where they will be set on "humbling you"). There's your reason why for the longest time in history, the hypothyroid have been exploited, because that's how we get to run a society.

The average woman is married to a husband who doesn't give a shit about her because a man who gives a shit brings out her bad behaviour. The average peasant lives under a tyrannical boss or government because that's what keeps their behaviour in check. Dogs have no higher inhibition, only fear and shame subdue them. They do not understand morals. They only see the world as a split between an oppressive class and a subservient class, and they will bother you most if they perceive you to be a part of their class. Showing-off is necessary in this world to remind them that you are not one of them and that they shouldn't be jealous or comparing themselves against you.

Have you seen how the ultra-rich and wealthy dress situationally? In a golf course, they dress as they please — plain shirts and trousers. Nothing fancy. But in public, or when they aren't to be seen amongst their kind but peasants, they keep a straight face and act important to communicate that they aren't to be bothered. The very fact that you're egalitarian (low brain serotonin, good blood circulation) means you are not metabolically crippled by destiny. You can tap into this gift in a sickly world where people are running around addicted to vanity in their misery, never satisfied and content with themselves. Saturated fats (coconut oil), sugars, and a good estrogen-blocker like nicotine are all fairly cheap and affordable. These will open up new realms of possibility, mental acuity, and emotional resilience unlike anything they have.

Thanks for your contribution and feel free to make this space comfortable enough to share your thoughts in!

No doubt that I don't belong to the peasantry as you describe. Also I can very much relate to how trying to discipline them even with constructive criticism, politely pointing out flaws, trying to bring nuance, requesting a certain refined behaviour or them switching to some easily accessible alternative, have led to nothing other than them being instantaneously triggered. However, my doubt would be about being an INTP in itself. I can obviously relate to accounts of INTPs the most among all. But as you know human behaviour can't be quantized, though approximations doesn't harm.